

Leonard Tate was the poet laureate of Grundy County, living from 1912 until 1989. He spent most of his life in working and writing in Beersheba Springs, Tn. The compilation of his work, All the Lost Octobers was published posthumously by the Beersheba Historical Society.

The Mocking Bird

A song came to me
As I lay in the grass,
And then disappeared,
Like breath from a glass.

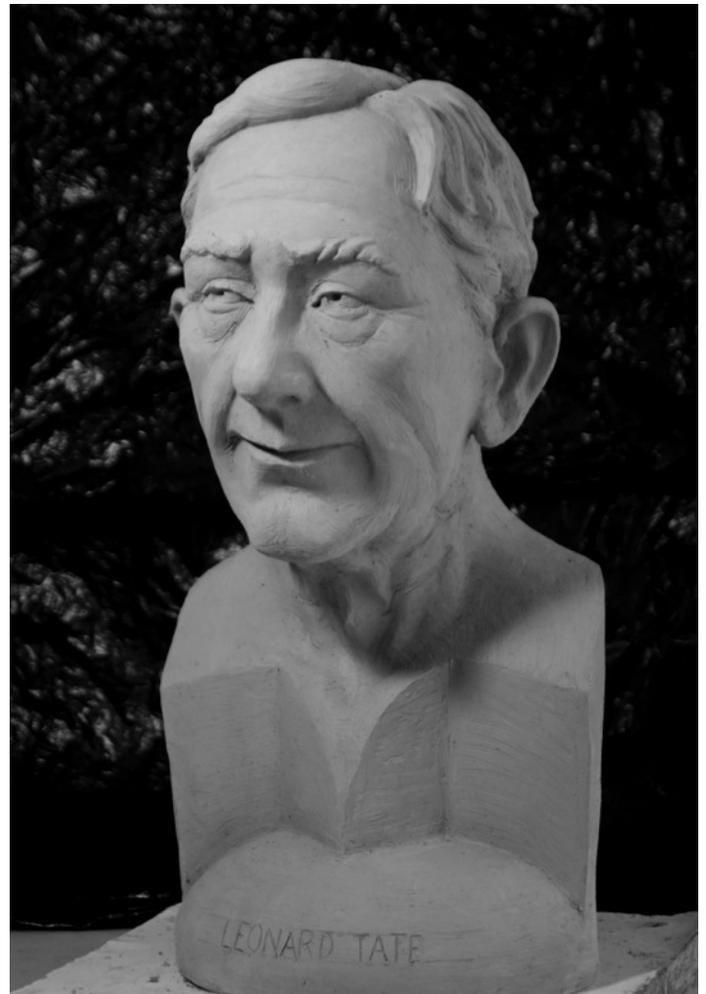

Next day I want back
To try to re-capture the vanquished refrain of such lyrical rapture.

But the trees were all dumb,
And the wind gave no cry;
No sound reached the stillness
Beneath the quiet sky.

Then at piccolo notes
Shaken down on the clover
I knew that my quest
Was suddenly over:

For a maple stood near
With a mocking bird in it,
Singing as if he must say everything that is sweet in a minute.

Bust of Leonard Tate

Artist:
Jo Fassnacht

My earliest memories of Leonard Tate go back to summer days as a child, walking along the road to the store. I can still see him, working with a swing blade, shoulder high in weeds, the blade whipping through air. As I walked by he would take a minute to say hello. After awhile at the store visiting with friends I would see him on my return, some yards along on his progress, the blade throwing large clumps of green left and right. At the time, to me, he seemed a force of nature. He was always patient, kind and keen to listen to others tell their stories, in which he seemed to have an abiding interest. I don't know when I found out he was a poet. I remember my mother Suzanne saying that he was a writer. To me he was a gentleman.
